Col. Jeff Davis' Letter .... Col. Tarpley, the recipient-general of all the behests, confidential and secret, of the absent spirits of his party, from Mr. Calhoun down to Father Stonestreet, has recently given to the world, "against the express wishes' of its author, too, we learn, one of the most characteristic letters that has enriched the political literature of the country this many a day. If, however, Mr. Tarpley as the selfconstituted keeper of the consciences of his private correspondents, deems it proper to give publicity to their wishes, privately expressed to him, a due regard for his honor and integrity justifies us in enquiring whether or not

Why express the happiness it would afford him should the injury resulting from his non-election to the was adopted. Senate of the United States be confined to himself alone? Why allude to the reluctance with which he accepted his present position? And why obtrude so prominently his sacrifices for his party in doffing Senatorial robes? Why all this in a private letter to a friend as familiar with his history as was the writer himself? Upon no other hypothesis can it be accounted for but this: Col. Davis wished to remind his forgetful party of his superior elaims, and was yet too modest to do it direct; answered, still the letter itself contains other and incontrovertible internal evidence of the fact that it was deliberately matured for the public eye, and to effect the approaching Senatorial election. Col. Davis says: "I have seen something of the manœuvering to which you refer in the attempts to north is jentitled to the next Senator. I am too minglial of my obligations to my friends in the northern part of the State to permit my name to be an obstacle to the accomplishment of any wish they may have in this matter; but there is a broad distinction between a few anxious candidates and the mighty people among whom they live; and I would certainly sel that I had labored to but little purpose if had now to declare that my love for Misissipi was not graduated by the proximity of ts parts to my own dwelling place.'

The richest part of the whole thing is that Col. Davis does not want to be balloted for with any thing like formidable opposition. In (yeas and nays to be published hereafter.) ther words, he is a candidate against the world if his election is certain; but then, if any serious doubt exists of the final result, he row. is not in. Such is not his language, it is true, but then it is the plain import.

As outsiders, we care very little about the Senatorial election, nor do we suppose that our friends in the Legislature busy their brains about it; yet we could not but allude to this coupe de main in political strategy, of one of the prominent aspirants, which, but for its memi-transparency, should be considered a
